Translated from the German for The Hebrew, by Alexander Blumensteil, A. B.

CHAPTER XI .- CONTINUED. Isaac, who seemed not to like the turn which the conversation was taking, now began :

"But to return to our subject; I must still confess that I have not changed my first opinion. I have noticed that the more we busy ourselves with the study of other matters, so much the less do we care for our religion; doubts of its importance easily arise, and soon we begin to despise the holy word—and of this dangerous all were in vain—at last, however, providence tendency I think that the writings of Aben had thrown Abraham in his way, and his heart Esra are not entirely free."

These words attracted much attention, and the guests involuntarily, as it were, turned towards Abraham, as if they expected him to reply. The latter quietly remarked:
"I am of course not here to vindicate Aben

"Bravo!" murmured the assemblage, and it admiration in a more boisterous manner were it not for the presence of Juda.
"Who is this man," whispered one to another, while Samuel in a suppressed tone cried to Isaac, "Is this a lounger, a booby or a fool?"

Isaac did not answer.

"I must coincide with the remarks of our friend Abraham," at last said Juda. But it is impossible for us to discuss such a subject sufficiently at the table. There is, however, another matter of which I would speak. We dwell no more within the limits of the Holy Land. We live among people of different views and religions. It is therefore our greatest aim, to command the respect of the race with which we associate, so that honoring us, they will also pay deference to our Faith. The muse of Zion has long been silent, and when it does attempt to give utterances, it speaks only in harsh and disagreeable tones. It is therefore necessary for us to revive its power, to cultivate poetry in our language, in order that we may add to the attractions which graced our worship in former

"Do not be hasty," interrupted Abraham; "one thing further, although it is more than I ever expected or dreamt of, that I ever would although this has been the greatest wish of my heat we must act with prudence, we have no right to take her by surprise, or force a concession from her. I beg of you, let matters take their natural course; you may if you please, show to your daughter, that you favor my attentions, but let her choose for herself. I will endeavor if possible to win her affections and then when that is accomplished, my happiness will only be completed when I shall receive the jewel I so highly prize, from your hands."

"Very well, let it be so. It is a mere matter." Isaac did not answer,
"I must coincide with the remarks of our tractions which graced our worship in former times. But we cannot do this, unless we become well versed in the poesy of every thing about us, and especially in Hebrew literature."

us, and especially in Hebrew literature."

After a pause Abraham said: "In Italy, I became acquainted with a new art of poetry, which although not being of the highest standard, still evinces in its display, the highest order of inspiration and learning. It is called improvising, and it consists in the giving of a subject, and the style of verse in which it is to appear, and immediately, thereupon, the poet declaims a few verses in accordance with the demand, without writing it beforehand. I have had the good it, although I must confess with very little cess," answered Abraham.

"Well, then, I wish that Rabbi Juda would give this gentleman an opportunity to test this art," interrupted Isaac, who hoped that he would now be enabled to humble the stranger.

Hellevi said: "I must confess that such an exhibition would please me much; still, however. Abraham, I will not press you, you can do as you choose."

After a moment of hesitation Abraham answered: "I am ready, rabbi, especially since you desire it, still I hope that you will overlook all short-comings. Perhaps I may be successful, and it may encourage my young friends to become conversant with the art.

"Well then so let it be," answered Juda, "and I beg of you first to approach accept the state of th

"I am Abraham Aben Esta of Toledo," answered Abraham, lowering his head.

Juda could not contain himself any longer,

CHAPTER XII.

It was not due to the excitement of the moment when Juda Hallevi said to Abraham, you must become my son!" No, it was the expression of his heart.

The great respect which he entertained for the writings of the young Aben Esra, his admiration for the talent of the young man, would of themselves have been sufficient to move Juda in the peculiar manner that we have seen. Besides he had long desired to obtain information of the wherabouts of the family of Aben Esra, in order that he might repay them, and make them share the emoluments of his position. For this reason he had caused many searches to be made for Abraham, and as we have seen almost overflowed with joy at thus meeting him. Upon Abraham also the words of Juda must have made a deep impression. For we know the love which he felt towards Hulda, and it seemed almost impossible that in so short a time he should arrive at the summit of his

"That is very wonderful," interrupted one of the students, can this also be done in the Hebrew language?"

"I doubt whether any of our people could be said:

"Abraham accceded to Hallevi's request, and detailed to him the experience of his youthful days. That he remained silent concerning the letter for aid which he once sent to Juda, and of the adventure with Hulda, on the bank of the river, the reader will easily imagine. Several times during the narration, tears would start to Juda's eyes while he pressed Abrabam's hand with emotion. When the latter had concluded, he said:

"I doubt whether any of our people could attempt such a task, added Juda.

"O, no, not at all, for I myself have assayed it, although I must confess with very little success."

"When the latter had concluded, he said:

"You appear to have acted very wrongly Abraham, in many instances. For I had felicitated myself on the thought that in Spain, there dwelt no deserving Israelite, who in the hour of dwelt no deserving Israelite, who in the hour of need ever hesitated to call upon Juda Hallevi for assistance. The servant entered and said that Hulda was ready to receive them.

They arose and proceeded to her apartment.
Juda entered first, and Hulda ran eagerly to meet him, when suddenly she observed Abraham following behind, and as if thunderstruck she halted. Juda who observed this, was frightened, and cried out "What is the matter?"

These words aroused Hulda from her entranced condition, and she answered.

"Do not believe him, father l" eried Hulda "He encountered the greatest danger for my sake. At a later day, I discovered the value of the service which he had done, for the sharp rocks. All of his audience were astounded, and and the floating trees showed to me how death most breathless listened to Abraham's poetic was presented in every wave. No! It is past, you are now among us, and we will not easily part with you—not so so filled with joy. It is past, you are now among us, and we will not easily part with you—not so

Abraham did not know what to answer, he felt himself embarrassed, his whole being seemed to sway in an ocean of happiness and bliss.

Juda, however, spoke: "Abraham, ever since you have crossed the threshold of my house, I have been surrounded with surprises, and each hour reveals you to me in a new and brighter light. I can hardly conceive that we ever could exist for a moment without you, so dear have you become to me, and my family," and he gazed meaningly upon Abraham. The latter, however, merely shook his head in silence.

Juda understood him, and continued: "yes,

Hulda, we will never part with him, and I am sure that you, my daughter, will do your utmost to render his stay a happy one."

Hulda blushed.

"Do you know my child who he is?".
"What more need I to know, than that he is the savior of my life?"

"Well then, Hulda," continued Juda, "what will you say if you should learn that his name is a great one, that it has a worth which ——." "Do not expose me, rabbi," interrupted

"You must know Abraham," added Juda in explanation," that I have permitted my daughter to read all the great works, and among them, I have specially recommended yours to her attention."

"Too much happiness has come to me, to-"Too much happiness has come to me, to-day," said Abraham, "I am afraid I cannot bear it. What are all the misfortunes of the past to the delights of this moment? What the it. What are all the misfortunes of the past to the delights of this moment? What the most direful adventures of my youth, to the reward which I now receive? Hulda, I am indeed highly pleased and gratified that you are acquainted with the efforts of my weak talent. It will encourage me to greater attempts—."

"Do not say weak talent, Abraham!" answered Hulda, who seemed to be deeply moved. Young as you are, you have already reached the pinnacle of celebrity and renown, and have proved yourself worthy of the highest praise. All that there is for you to do in the future is to remain yourself, to be as you have been. I can scarcely imagine what I have done to deserve the fortune which has befallen me, to be a daughter of a Juda Hallevi, and to possess an Abraham Aben Esra as a savior of my life. What am I? If you had lost your life for me, in the waves, my name would have been handed

Abraham in the presence of her father after she recognized in him, the savior of her life and also as her secret monitor, when she observed the love which her father displayed for him, she could not doubt concerning two things: first that Abraham loved her, and secondly that her father favored his intentions. Then it was that she awakened from her dreams. And as when one who daving for a time, away from the surroundings of his home, enjoyed happiness in a strange land, finally returns, and welcome with gladness the domestic hearth and its lovely quiet, and afterwards is again troubled with visions of past adventures while the heart revels in pleasures of by gone days, nevertheless, returns again, to its home, to leave it no more, so it was with Hulda. Juda, Abraham, Moses, was her home, whence she belonged—Arthur of Beaumont, the court, the queen and the banquets, were the strange pleasures in which she at times were the strange pleasures in which she at times might delight end enjoy herself, but which she was, nevertheless, bound to give up and forget. Therefore, it was, that she turned her entire heart towards the friends of her home, and divided her love among them. She knew that as yet she did not love Abraham, but she hoped that in time, when she would become better acquainted with him, and behold his nobleness of character or book in the light of his gening acquainted with him, and behold his nobleness of character, or bask in the light of his genius for a few more days, she would be enabled to love him, and to be inseparably his.

But the time pressed. Two days yet remained before the tournament would take place, to which in a moment of rashness she had given her consent to accompany Arthur. As yet she had not possessed the courage to take back her consent. in fact she had not even the presence of mind to inform her father of the affair. But, she, nevertheless knew, that as soon as she would go with Arthur to this festive scene, Abraham would construe it into an answer to his suit, and for a man like Aben Esra, a single hint, one answer would be sufficient, he would never demand another answer. It was therefore that a strife ensued within her—it was on that account, that she paced so restlessly up and down her apartment. She was determined not to go to the tournament. An excuse could easily be devised. But then a faleshood? That surely she could not be guilty of, the openhearted and friendly cavalier did not deserve a deceit. After a few moments of deep thought, in which she saw that she stood upon a precipice, upon a road which was to decide her destiny; and that which she had in a moment of heedlessness-consented to, was in fact to give expression to her future; she that she could not refuse the cavalier without good and substantial grounds, and yet she was aware that it was necessary to

AFFGHANISTAN AND THE LOST TRIBES.

The mountains of the Indian Caucasus, the mountains of Cabul, are said to be visible, in clear weather, from a distance of two hundred clear weather, from a distance of two hundred and fifty miles; lifting their hoary heads sublimely into the clear calm heavens, they will represent "the terrible crystal" of the prophet. Roving myriads of people have been attracted by this sight, as if to travel onwards and upwards in imagination, along the mountain pathway, to the realms of glory and of rest. The traditions of the whole world celebrate these stupendous heights, many of whose light crowned pinnacles are supposed to stand more than ed pinnacles are supposed to stand more than twenty thousand feet above the common level of this earth. Their magnificence and their mystery have drawn nations together in adoring wonder into the hills and valleys so fruitful, and bounteous, and beautiful, around their feet. CHAPTER KITI.

Abraham was compelled to take up his habitation in Juda Hallevi's house. The latter would very seldom permit him to leave his presence. There was too much attraction to separate them. Learning, wisdom; concern for their welfare, all these aided in binding these two friends together. Did they at times differ in certain views, it only gave an additional charm to their conversation, but the urbanity which possessed both, the fatherly love which Juda entertained for Abraham, was sufficient to keep them together, without any other induced the former's mind, disposed and his heart filled with admiration of her many and his heart filled wi Paradise. A WOMAN'S REVENCE

The Court Journal, describing Prince Napoleon's ball, says:—"The Princess Clotide is attired, as usual, without the slightest pretensions to extravagance of fashion, and yet looking the most aristocratic grande dame of the whole the most aristocratic grande dame of the whole company. Her dress was of plain pink tulle, the skirt full trimmed with rich garlands of bright green leaves. None of the jewels belonging to the Italian treasuries, about which so much absurd nensense has been uttered, but her neck was adorned with emeralds as big as the staring eye-balls of the green-eyed monster, while her brow was encircled with a simple wreath of green leaves, which, casting a mysterious shadow over her features, added to the pensive melancholy expression they always bear. The Empress was standing near, her sweetly soft style of beauty contrasting strongly with the somewhat hard and unfinished contour so characteristic of the Carignans. Her majesso characteristic of the Carignans. Her majes ty's dress was of sea-green tulle, puffed, looped, and fringed with diamonds. The exact concordance of the shade of green and pink adopted for the two dresses was observed by the artist connoisseurs to be so remarkable, that it was agreed amongst them that the conturieres must have conferred together beforehand. One of the great posterial pointers was observed to have conferred together beforehand. One of our great portrait painters was observed to contemplate the amalgamation of tone and color with the greatest interest. 'You are thinking of a picture, said a confere, rousing him from his reverie by a gentle tap on the shoulder. 'No, indeed; I was thinking of the Empress Josephine.' 'Ah, yes—young days, young days,' returned the other, maliciously.' Pooh, pooh! I was just then at St. Cloud, and before me was standing the lovely Josephine and the still more beautiful Princess Pauline. The pair of beauties could never agree. The pair of beauties could never agree. The reception was given by order of the Emperor for the express purpose of a recognition and a reconciliation between them being acknowledged. The Princess Pauline's entrance caused great sensation, and we all pressed forward to view the effect produced upon the Empress. great sensation, and we all pressed forward to view the effect produced upon the Empress. The latter, with imperial grace, smiling sweeply, rose to lead her rival to a seat. The two ladies shared equally the admiration of the company as they stood side by side; but presently, when seated, the beauty of the princess seemed suddenly to fade—to grow dingy as it were—her skin to assume a yellow aspect, and her hair, arranged with turquoises and blue ribbons, to lose its lustre. To add to the evil effect, the princess herself began to grow fretul, and to look around with anxiety, and finally, as it overcome by depression, she retired, out of humor with herself and all besides. The next day, at the sitting, the Empress inquired what I thought of Pauline's beauty. 'Splendid when standing,' said I, daubing away at my background with the greatest agitation; but she should never sit down when her dress is of light blue satin—at least in a green velvet fautenil!' Thereupon, to hide the confusion occasioned by the consciousness of my own impertinence, I the consciousness of my own impertinence, I brushed away more valiantly than ever, dodging behind my canvas to await the reprimand I behind my canvas to await the reprimend I felt sure was coming. But a silvery laugh, like the pearly tinkling of the waterfall visible from the window of the apartment wherein we were seated, was the first signal given that my observation had been understood. 'Ah! ces coquins d'artistes!' exclaimed her majesty, her eyes glistening with fun and mischief. 'And so you found me out!' It was a harmless woman's vengeance; but I could not help thinking that the princess would have preferred an open duel with swords or pistols to the frightful punishment she had undergone."

THE PROPOSED EMIGRATION OF THE ROMAN LEWS.—We have stated that in France some time ago the project was started to raise funds in order to assist the Roman Jews to quit this inhospitable city. In reference to this scheme, an Italian correspondent writes to the A. I in which the project was advocated. "We are particularly struck with the energy with which you defend the cause of our brethren in Rome particularly struck with the energy with which you defend the cause of our brethren in Rome and with your generous assistance to promote their emigration. I must, however, avow that I see two great obstacles to the realization of this philanthropic object; the one material, and the other moral. It is, in my opinion, almost impossible to find the money necessary for the emigration of about five thousand persons. Any year and a half ago a generous gentleman, who carefully concealed his name, attempted a similar undertaking upon a smaller scale. Two families arrived here, recommended to us, provided with a small amount of money sufficient to meet the first expenses, and to trade upon a small scale, but after two months they found themselves unable to gain a livelihood, and they were obliged to go to Ancona. There they remained some time, but the larger family of the two, which seemed by its capacity and character to have the best chance of success, was obliged to return to Rome as poor as ever. Unfortunately it must be acknowledged, what occurred in this instance occurs often, and if we are successful in bringing about an immigration in mass, must occur in a still greater degree. But I must now state the moral obstacle that arists—this is the difficulty, and almost impossibility, of persuading the Israelites to quit Rome. Alathough they are there the butt of all persecutions, the love of their native country is still strong, and cannot be easily conquered.

The Scotsman publishes a very interesting letter, dated from Catania, describing the late eruption of Mount Etna, regarding which some particulars have already appeared. At Messina, when the writer was on his way to Catania, the somewhat exaggerated announcement reached him that Etna was in full eruption; that the lava had already run so fast and so far that the road to Catania was blocked up; that thousands of peasants had fled from their homes in terror of destruction; and that a war vessel had left Messina, carrying the prefect and a staff of engineers to the scene, with the view of saving life and property. This induced him, in company with his wife and three gentlemen, to pay a visit to the volcano. He goes on to describe a visit to the volcano. He goes on to describe

"We start in spite of weather and all remon-strances as to our imprudence. Once or twice the horses are brought to a stand-still by the furious gusts of wind which sweep down the mountain gorges; but, fortunately, the rain has not lasted long enough to render any of the not lasted long enough to render any of the fumari dangerous, so we meet with no serious obstacle on the way. The thunder rolled incessantly, and the lightning flashed with little intermission throughout the day; but from time time the rain ceased, and allowed us to get glimpses of the sea, glowing—under the inflaence of the changing light—in all the colors of the rainbow. Near the shore it is comparatively calm, as the wind is from the land, and comes only in fitful gusts; but occasionally it switches up from the water clouds of spray, which scud along like snow-drifts chasing each other across the surface, till, swept far out to sea, they meet opposing currents of air, and are whirled aloft in circling eddies, forming young waterspouts. It is almost dark before we reach the steep zigzags leading up from the main road to Taor-mina, where we intend to sleep. On reaching a sudden turn, we see in the clouds a long undulating line of red light—the edge of a thun-dercloud touched with gold by the rays of the setting sun. But no, that cannot be, the mass of clouds is impenetrable, and the sun has long gone down. It is the lava stream. Etna outlined with a pencil of living fire. And now the low rumbling of the still distant volcane breaks on the ear, mixed up with the peals of thunder which continue to reverberate among the mountains. As the night deepens, the clouds begin to clear away, the stream of lava becomes brighter, and the light emitted from the crater, which was at first but faintly reflected from the clouds above, becomes more and more brilliant, until the whole sky over the mountain glows with a turid light. Here and there at different points bright jets of flame appear for a few minutes and then vanish. These, we suppose, arise from the burning of trees set on fire by the lava or the falling scorize. There appear to be six craters quite distinct, but situated near each other. From all these, in irregular succession, sometimes from several at a time, there are ince sint discharges—huge masses of red-hot stones and scorize thrown to an immense height, with volumes of stream and smoke which reflect the fires from the red hot cauldron below. The glowing smoke flickers in the breeze as if it were flame, and through it and far above it, with the naked eye, we can see the red-hot stones mount and then fall slowly back into the abyss. I regret having omitted to note the time which hese stones took to rise and fall, as that might have given an approximate idea of their size, and the height to which they were ejected. But Taormina is from twelve to fourteen miles distant in a direct line from the crater, so that the stones, to be seen at all, must have been very enormous. Comparing the height to which they seemed to rise with the appearance which such a building as St. Paul's when so far removed might present it could not be less than 1,000 feet. From the windows of the hotel we watch the volcano till long past midnight, and retire to bed, having resolved to ascend to-morrow to the lava stream. At the untimely hour of four we are again roused, that before starting on our journey we may visit the Greek Theatre, and from its ruined arches see the Theatre, and from its ruined arches see the summit of Etna 'tipped with gold' by the first rays of the morning sun as he rises from behind the Calabrian mountains. Leaving Taormina at nine, we drive to Mascali. The weather is a complete contrast to that of yesterday—bright, clear and calm. As we pass along among almond trees in full blossom, through orange and lemon groves glowing with their golden fruit, the ground carpeted with young flax or the brighest green, and see the laborers following their peaceful occupations in the fields, it is their peaceful occupations in the fields, it is difficult to realise the idea that within a few miles a volcano is breaking up the crust of the earth and spreading a deluge of liquid fire over its surface. We arrive at Mascali about midday, and, after a short time spent in procuring a guide, and a porter to carry some wrappers and eatables, we commenced the uscent. To our suprise we are accompanied by several villagers, who volunteer their gratuitous services, and divide with our porter the few articles we thought it necessary to carry with us. As we ascend, we meet with a peasant marching of with his household gods, and make a small subscription for his relief. He tells us the lava will carry off off his cettage to merrow. Strings of mules are descending, loaded with the produce of the vineyards, which are being carried to a place of safety. We are allowed to drink ad libitum from the barrels, and make free use of the privilege by means of a hollow reed supplied by the drivers. We find the wine, which resembles a fair Bordeaux in flavor and quality, delicious and refreshing. A walk of three hours over a used but not a difficult road, brings note the layer. hours over a used but not a difficult road, brings us to the lava. As we approach, the rumbling sound from the cruption becomes louder and louder; but, as the sun gains power and brilliancy, the volcano becomes invisible to the eye. A faint line of smoke along the current of lava, and a dark cloud hanging over the crater, are the only visible signs which he gives of his existence—signs which if met with on a Scotch mountain, might be passed by as arising from moor burning. The stream of lava which we visited is said to have flowed from six to eight miles, between the crater and the point it has now reached. It has mot with an obstruction in Monti Arsi, an elevation rising on a compar-portion of the current which is flowing ards Mascali has a breadth of some two to be hundred yards, and a depth on its sloping front of from twenty to twenty-five feet. It may be approached without much inconveniencce, and with perfect safety; for although large masses are constantly rolling down, there is always time enough to escape before they reach the bottom. We advanced and burned the ends of our walking sticks in the glowing mass, that we might carry off homely souvenirs in front of the stream, for the purpose of arresting its progress. As these had prudently been placed where the elevation might be expected to assist the efforts of the saint, we may hope they will be successful. Within a few yards of the lava, and in the direct line of its course, is a farmhouse from which the furniture had been carried off. Men were busy carrying off the beams of the roof, with the other timber work, and filling up the cisterns with stones. When the lava comes in contact with a large body of water, dangerous explosions take place through its rapid conversion into steam. The execution of these works is superintended by soldiers and engineers, who press the peasants of the district into the service. Now we come to understand why the villagers were so attentive. They hoped by rendering a light voluntary service to us, to see the eruption without being called on to perform a heavier forced one to others. Unwilling to allow the lazy rascals to escape under cover of our flag, I pointed out to the soldiers who came to take them off those who were really engaged with us, and left the others to their fate. One of them seemed to run the risk of being shot, so unwilling was he to go, and so furious did his captors become at his resistance. Little good, however, was got out of them; for a signal was made by some of our party on leaving, and they all joined us before we were many yards down the hilf. The point which the lava has reached I calculate to be about 2,400 feet above the level of the sea, and the crater some 1,500 feet higher, or one-third of the way up the mountain. We followed the stream towards its source, until we were driven off by the heat, the blinding dust, and the sulphurous smoke. Of the three, the dust was the most troublesome. Below us we could see the course of the current filling up the hollows and spreading over the flatter surfaces like a huge black lacier; while above, confined in a narrow gorge, it came tumbling over a precipice in a dark mass, relieved by streaks of fire. We waited until night set in, when the lava began to glow again, and soon assumed the appearance it pre-sented from Taormina of a river or cascade of fire. If I were to say that in some way or other the sun quenches the fire on the surface of the lava, as one sees him distinguish a fire in an ordinary grate, I suppose I should be told I was stumbling into a vulgar error. But it is difficult to get rid of this idea, so marked the difference between the day and night appearance of the lava. An Italian engineer who was on the mountain took some rough measurements, and calculates that the crater has already discharged English miles. I consider the estimate of the distance too high; and as the eruption began only four days ago, it does not seem to tally with the other calculations. The descent was a much more difficult affair than the ascent, and was effected at the rate of a mile in the hour, with no small risk of broken and sprained with no small risk of broken and sprained limbs. Luckily, we were assisted by a bright moonlight, and got back to Mascali without accident, after being eight hours on foot on the mountain—no great affair for a montagnard, but not bad work for a lady."

Gun Corron.-One of the most extraordipary facts connected with the property of gun cotton, as respects its giving greater results in proportion to the resistance offered to it is the following: It is on record that a box containing proportion to the resistance offered to it is the following: It is on record that a box containing twenty-five pounds of gun cotton was laid close to some palisading of strong beams one foot squaret, and driven eight feet into the ground, backed by a second row of beams eight inches square. The cotton was fired and cut a clean opening nine feet wide, through which, had the palisades been part of a fortification, any number of soldiers could have quickly passed. Had the gun cotton been loose it would have produced no effect. Three times as much gunpowder was exploded, but produced no damaging effect whatsoever against the piles. At the siege of the fort of Ghuznee, and in later days at Delhi, the besiegers captured both cities by forcing a way through the main gates: A select party were told off, who boldly rushed to the gates, and, nailing on a bag of gunpowder, fired a fuse connected therewith and retired, with the exceptions of those brave spirits who fell from the deadly fire kept up on them from the besieged. The gunpowder blew the gates to atoms, but a similar amount of gun cotton would have failed to produce any effect in the same manner. Yet, confined in a slight box, so that the gases formed might penetrate the whole charge, gun cotton of one-third the weight of gunpowder would have produced greater effects. We see that, had gun cotton been used in the above cases, a weight which one man might have carried, and perhaps have passed with unobserved, would have answered all the purposes; whilst by using gunpowder the weight to be carried was necessarily increased beyond the capabilities of one man, had in consequence more valuable lives were lost than need have been. The prejudice against gun cotton is great in the minds of most artillery officers; but would they enter into the subject fairly, and weigh the incalculable advantages which, if perfected, it must possess over gunpowder, there would be many more advecates for its adoption. twenty-five pounds of gun cotton was laid close

MINISTERIAL BAL MASQUE IN PARIS. The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph describes a reception in masquerade given by Mme. Drouyn de Lhuys, wife of the Minister for Foreign Affairs. He writes:—It was a masquerade, the first great private one of the year—and inaugurated the season of testivity, when diplomacy hides its face and asks its friends to make merry. "On dansera," said the invitation; and they did dance. If Mr. Drouyn de Lhuys only carries into the other duties of his ministry the spirit, energy, and tact displayed in every arrangement last night, he must be the best minister in Europe, and should be kept in office till "death do us part." The ball may be said to have begun on that bridge over which you cross the Seine. There you were marshalled into line by mounted gendarmes, and there you first saw other pursuers of pleasure waiting patiently in their carriages, or more eager enthusiasts defying the cold, and walking in light costumes, or in those weird dominoes which seem only fitted for Venice and gondolas, before the admiring crowd. Etiquette does not oblige you to enter masked, but many do and then you are taken into a sort of large confessional, and requested to show your face in confidence to the groom of the chambers. This is done, observed an Irish friend, just to show them you are nobody else. This ordeal gone through, you assume your disguise, and walk up stairs. The first man you meet is let us see, Julius Cæsar, with a brass helmet, and a very toga, who has been brought from a dinner party by a Japanese—a most wonderful get up! Indeed, so natural was it that the wearer, later in the evening, came to grief with an "original article" from that country, who insisted on talkin his native tongue to his compatriot, and was so enraged at not getting any answer, that I am expecting hourly to hear that he has committed the " happy despatch." Passing this ill-matched pair-by-the-by, the Roman emperor was christened "the First Edition" as soon as he appeared you came on Faith, Hope, and Charity the last had, in accordance with the proverb, begun at home," and, judging from the success of her elaborate toilette, she must have begun very early. I am sure if "vice to be hated needs but to be seen," these three virtues had but to be seen" to make others followers of virtue. Why had one of them wings? Was it emblematic of hovering Faith, or of fleeting Hope, or of Charity flying right away when most required? I saw one follower of Virtue, diplomatist from a recently "demenaged" court, who verily did reap his reward. He was entrosted with the three wands which disinguished the virtuous trio while it went to dance, and as one of them had Hope's anchor on the top, which would "grapple" everyone, life was for a time a burthen to that polite diplomatist. Then enters upon the scene an Eastern prince, with more jewels than the originals ever wear—rows of pearls ruffled round his neck; his gaberdine was like the starry firmament on high;" and round his head a halo of rubies. To him succeeds the Rimsky Korsakow, in a Russian court dress, splendid her robe literally massive with precious stones. With her walks an ambassador, who wears the costume which is de riguer if you are not masked-that is, evening dress, knee breeches and a Venetian cloak, which is like the cape of the Life Quarls, only decorated with a little mask. eighty milhon cubic metres of solid matter, that the progress of the different branches added together would amount to seven metres per together would amount to seven metres per swell," wears also a blue ribbon. Suddenly up minute, and the length of the whole to forty five stalks Don Quixote, who is, when at home, a captain of French artillery, about seven feet high—say seven feet; the very best costume and the best kept-up character in the room. With his usual gallantry, the Hidalgo de la Manche paid great attention to the ladies. His bow to Mary Queen of Scots was quite worth going to the ball to see. The unhappy daughter of the Stuarts seemed in better spirits than when I last heard of her, which was through one Scott, at Lochleven; but I question if Mary herself was ever really dressed more completely a la Reine d'Ecosse than was, last night—this morning, when was it 1-the Countess Keller, who had even dyed her hair to the traditional color. I call that "feeling a part and going into it," as Mr. Crummles said of his "firsttragedy," man! There were other Scotch there one, a Gordon, in his clan tartan and the kilt, worn easily, who, I fear, rather—not to put too fine a point on it—took the shine out of some French who had assumed the Highland garb, in which they looked as if they had come out in a horry and had forgotten their nether coverings, and so felt naturally uncomfortable. Again place aux dames, and a good deal of it. Here you see a real Anglo-Indian princess; she is dressed not only in fine feathers, but also in fine birds. Imagine a dress of mariboo feathers interspersed with birds of paradise, and other interspersed with birds of paradise, and other specimens of the genus avis. With this feathered songstress—well, I do not no whether she sang—let us say feathered dancer—walks a thing in pink. I believe he was a "Berger," and looked as if he had just stepped from out a teacup of old china; his manly form was clad in pink, he had pink stockings, pink shoes, pink rosettes, over his face was a light pink veil, and the "edifice was crowned" by a pink hat, covered with a garland of roses. He looked like the ghost of a strawbury ice, and was much admired. with a garland of roses. He looked like the ghost of a strawbury ice, and was much admired. I preferred the tragic muse, who had come in her nighttrail, and evidently being cold, pulled it closely round her. She seemed odd, however, walking with a Magyar chief, who swaggered along in his handsome national costume as if he were back in Pesth. A knight in chain armour then clanks by, and an Albanian with literally a bundle of arms, which he must have found a great blessing in the crowd, as it kept a free great blessing in the crowd, as it kept a free circulation around him. An English volunteer, in a dark green uniform, created quite a sensation, and Cleopatra, an English Parisian beauty in a robe of white, round the skirt of whose dress were inscribed hieroglyphic fligures, copied from the base of the pillar in the Place de la Concorde, and whose hair hung down to her waist "in all the wildness of dishevelled charm,"

PARTORY THE PERENT REMEMBER THE SABBATH.

A movement is now on foot among the whole sale merchants of San Francisco to close their places of business every Saturday at noon, and we are informed that the same will in all probability be carried into effect. Saturday, our Christian merchants say, is not a very busy day; goods shipped into the interior will have, in many instances, to remain a day at the landing, before they can be conveyed inland by the teams. Besides all this, their employees, as well as themselves, need rest from the anxiety and exigencies of trade. Overtaxed bodies and overtaxed brains need rest. We are pleased to note this movement on the part of the Christian community, inasmuch as we trust it will be an incentive to an united action on the part of our co-religionists to observe the Sabbath as it should be. We have frequently impressed upon the Hebrew merchants not alone the necessity of observing the Lord's commandment to "remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy, but the fact that such observance would go far towards elevating our people in the eyes of the world at large. The excuse heretofore urged, the necessities of business, together with the competition always to be found in large commercial marts, is being done away with, and can no longer avail. A reform in this point is essential. Those who attend the Synagogue will shortly find that all business channels are closed almost immediately with the completion of morning service, and it would therefore be a reform—one in which all Hebrews would take just pride-if all our brethren could abstain from labor on the Sabbath. Pecuniarily, our brethren can stand a suspension of business on pleasure. Sheridan fully appreciated this fact that day; morally and religiously, they should when he penned the following lines: do so, and in so doing they would command the respect of all well-thinking men, and thus gradually conquer what little bigotry there remains in the minds of certain classes of the American

To be honest, sincere and conscientious man must respect his creed; unless he does, he cannot expect to obtain the countenance or respect of his Christian neighbors. The Jewish merchants of San Francisco have no excuse for - being Sabbath breakers; they are not ignorant, or impoverished, but they love mammon better than their God. The Christians are shanning them, and we trust will shame them into a better observance of their religion.

When we consider the strict ruling of our great Law-giver, Moses, and the rigid enforce ent thereof by Rabbinical law, we can see the wisdom of the Jewish sages. They commanded a complete cessation of all labor, not that the Jew should pass the day in total inactivity, but to put a stop to all wrangling and striving for pelf, thus temporarily checking man in his mad race after an increase of unholy advantage. In plain far guage, this ordinance of the Sabbath was framed expressly to forbid productive activity, and at the same time to give that relaxation necessary for man to perfect his labors on working days. The Fourth Commandment is not a mere Utopian law, the idle offspring of some speculative mind, but it is an ordinance given by an actual legislator to a people which was to practice it sempulously, and whose observance thereof for fifteen centuries has made it the pillar of their faith in one God.

LADIES' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY TO MOTTON evening, an operatic performance will be given at the Metropolitan Theatre, in aid of the funds of the Ladies' United Hebrew Benevolent Society. The claims of this Society on the Jewish the great benefits accounts to indigent and distressed co-religionists from its successful working are so manifold, that we are certain the on this occasion, and there will be such a flow into the coffers of this Society as will give joy to those noble hearted ladies who undertake to distribute the bounty placed at their disposal. The opera aunounced for the evening is " La bula," in which the entire company and a grand chorus will take part

OUR NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

From the resident correspondent of THE HERREW. NEW YORK, April 3, 1865.

EDITOR HEBREW :- Another week has passed and the announcement in the papers that a steamer will sail for San Francisco on the 3d eminds me of the fact that the time for holding my usual conversazione with your readers has arrived. And if that circumstance gives the co-religionists on your side of the water as much pleasure as it does me, there need be no fear but that we always will have a pleasant time together. I can almost imagine myself, when writing my correspondence, in the presence of your readers themselves, telling them by word of mouth of the incidents which I indite; and it is on that account that I lay aside all feelings of restraint and diffidence, and make no ceremony of introducing myself. As soon as I have a sufficient batch of news wherewith to make my arrival agreeable, I am dispatched by the Gods and under the guiadance of the "North Star" or the "Northern Light" I fly to your golden shores and relieve myself of the burden which I carry. I am again with you, and ifyour anxious readers that crowd around me will permit, I will spread out my stores before them, displaying them to as great advantage as I may be able to do.

My first duty is a mournful one. Often have your readers and I laughed at the recountal of some elopement, intrigue or humorous adventure which has taken place on the Atlantic shores; but alas happiness cannot last long-to-day we laugh and are joyful, to-morrow we cry and our hearts are filled with seriousness. In one instant we are uproarious with mirth and revelling in the sunshine of good fortune or happiness, as it is termed; we forget the future and think only of the present. But hark, suddenly a low rumbling sound is heard, at first scarcely audible; gradually however it increases in energy until finally the thunder and lightning break directly over our heads and overwhelms us with their fury. Our ground, prosperity in affright darts away to its hidden recesses and the fiend of adversity with his features lit up by demonical joy advances of synagogue thus consecrated is very finely furplans of jollity are dashed mercilessly to the towards us, and bids us prepare to receive him. Such is the vanity of human happiness and

"True happiness is not the growth of earth,
The soil is fruitless if you seek it there,
'Tis an exotic of celestial birth,
And never blows but in celestial air.

Sweet plant of paradise! Its seeds are sown In here and there a breast of heavenly mould It rises slow, and buds, but ne'er was known To blossom here—the climate was too cold!"

"But why this mournfulness, why indulge in such sad strains?" I hear your readers ask me. I will answer them in as few words as possible;

A few weeks ago the young portion of the raelitish community were startled by a death Edward Melius. in their midst. Now that of itself was not the cause of excitement, for we all must travel the

"Death's but a path that must be trod
If man would ever pass to God."

But the circumstances that attended the decease were the causes which led to the unwonted agitation which it occasioned. It was that of a young lady of about nineteen summers, she had appeared often in our social circles. At the grand Jewish balls and parties where she had reigned as a belle, four years ago, when but a little girles it were, she made the acquaintance of a young man, who, attracted by her many virtues and her beauty visited her often, and finally courted and won her. They became engaged, and for the space of eighteen months they seemed attached to each other, and the happiness of the pair was envied by spinsters and pointed out as models by mothers to their marriageable sons and daughters. Suddenly, however, a change took place in this earthly paradise, the fiend of avarice entered this hitherto peaceful abode, and where once was all gladness and sunshine, appeared sorrow and darkness. The young man began to tire of his beloved, he perceived about him many females that had large inheritances in expectancy, who smiled upon him, and he began to look with disdain upon her whom he began to look with disdain upon her whom he had formerly praised to the skies. He now gazed upon her through the yellow light of gold, and for the first time perceived that she had not sufficient of the "earthly dross" to satisfy him. He imagined himself capable of winning the richest maden in town, and why, contemplaed he, should I, the par excellence of New York eaux, the perfection of male beauty, and to whom community are so universally acknowledged, and so many hearts would assuredly surrender if they community are so universally acknowledged, and discount and disco ous but poor maiden. No, I will not thus sacrifice myself, rather let her grieve and die than I should throw myself away."

And she did die, for it requires not long for a loving heart to perceive changes in its beloved; she soon observed his indifference, for he concealed it not, and her nature, unable to bear the disappointment, wilted under its dire influence. Her heart that was formerly so light and gay who was the most joyful at social gatherings, now remained retired and alone. Still she complained not to those around her, she told no one of the misfortune which had befallen her,

Like a worm in the bud feed
On her damask cheek."

But at last she could not even veil her sorrow nature asserted its supremacy, and six weeks ago the maiden became ill and took to her bed. Then it was that her relatives discovered the true cause of her sadness and sorrow, for there ine was seized with the pangs of remorse, and the last she granted his first request but the latter was without her power. She lingered a formally him spirit, that ow days longer, and finally her spirit took its ight to a better land where there is no deception and no grief.

Her funeral took place on Wednesday week and was attended by a large number of her friends. Here her destroyer was present, with friends. Here her destroyer was present, with friends. the He stood beside her grave and as her last mitted members of the College on the 25th ult. conscience no longer and he fainted. A few friends bore him in this condition to his carriage, after which he was borne to his room, where they left him to brood over his crime alone.
What paugs he endured and still suffers none know but himself and He who looks into the hearts of all; but still their fearfulness can be imagined and therefore I need not attempt to describe them, suffice it to say that since the day of the funeral he has not appeared before the public gaze, but has remained shut up in his own apartment tortured by his own thoughts. All his former acquaintances of both sexes have shunned him, and the doors that were formerly thrown wide open for his reception are now closed firmly against him, and the maidens that once sought his company and smiled graciously upon him, are now as ready to shun and avoid and walls ready to fall. Still, M. Gensiac's de-

Such is the direful punishment that is meted out to him, a terrible one it is indeed for a young man; but still it may work a useful lesson, and if it does not wash away the faults which he occasioned, if he does not partly cleanse his heart and make it truly repentant, it will at least be an example for others and teach them to appreciate the heart that loves it whether it offers its adoration under the sunshine of prosperity or comes with empty hands as far as worldly wealth is concerned. For

"Riches, like insects, while conceal'd they be Wait but for wings, and in their seasons fly; To whom can riches give repute and trust, Content or pleasure, but the good and just? Judges and Senates have been bought for gold, Esteem and love are never to be sold."

But enough of this sad story, let us discuss ther matters at least of a more joyful nature. I would not as it is write so long an account of the story as I have, were it not that I thought it might interest the youthful portion of your readers and afford them a subject for reflection and conversation for a few short hours. Besides have frequently detailed to them the bright side of love, as exemplified by recent cases of elopements, etc., and why not, when the occasion presents itself, also reveal the darkened portion? I feel, therefore, that your readers have pardoned me for taking up so much of their time, and with this agreeable consciousness I will proceed to conclude my epistle.

The new synagogue of the Congregation Shaar Harhomajim was consecrated on the 31st ult. in this city. The ceremonies partook of attendance. Rev. Dr. Adler delivered the dedicatory address, while Rev. Dr. Lilienthal offered dresses to one of these foreigners. In time the usual character and there was a large up a very eloquent prayer on behalf of the congregation. AN EPISCOPAL CENSURE:-The Bishop Trevisio, in Austrian Italy, lately published a censure, a true philippic, against those Christians who attended a Jewish funeral out of respect to the remains of a deceased Hebrew. LIFE IN VENIOR.

A lively Frenchman, M. Gensiac, of Revue Contemporaine, has just published an account of his recent visit to Venice, from which we gather that the ancient glories of the Queen of the Adriatic" have incontinently departed. Under Austrian rule it has become as it were, a city of the dead, and late events have thrown such a pall over the once animated scene as to leave nothing better than marble palaces (some inhabited) looking dismally down on the victor-some waste, others with rifts in the walls, windows absent, doors broken, tails are of very great luterest, and worthy the labor of condensation. We have space, however, only for the following:

WATER CARRIERS.

In the court of the Doge's palace may be seen, at the same hour every day, groups of women, fifty or sixty in number, , who perform for the indolent Venetian housewives the same office as the Auvergnat water carriers do for the Parisians. Each is provided with two buckets, and, as her turn comes, she lets down her vesse by a cord, neither well being provided with windlass or pulley. Having filled and drawn up her two buckets, and thereby made the rope marks in the bronze margin of the well a little deeper, she yokes them as milk girls hoist their cans, and trudges through the small squares and narrow cale (alleys) where her patrons reside. The loiterers in the palace yard looking on at the filling of the buckets will scarcely hear a word spoken among these half-hundred women, as if deep respect were still due to the place which once owned the sway of the Doge, or the still more dreaded sway of the three In-

These women all come from among the hills of Friuli, the snowy tops of which may be seen from the city. They wore a wooden jacket in winter, and appear in summer in their chemisesleves. Their petticoats are of green or blue stuff, adorned with a red stripe at the bottom; their bonnets are of black or gray felt or straw, and in their back hair they arrange, in the guise of a coronet, as many large silver or steel pins as they can afford. The Venetians being still many return to their native villages with there little hoard, and find matches among their old

The Venetians have long enjoyed the privilege of employing themselves as little in household affairs as possible. At first every individual of full age had a vote. In 1773 this right was confined to four hundred and seventy individuals, yearly selected from the six quarters of sum in accordance with their custom they dis-tributed in the following manner:

the city. In 1279 the existing electors had the privilege secured to themselves and their descendants in perpetuity, and from these and year being next gone through with, resulted as under a mask, but he would not, to save his soul alive, exercise a profession or enter into trade. On this theme we quote our French authority:

attend others nor attend themselves. poorest Venetian has a servant to light the fire, even when there is no wood, and to put on the pot, though there should be no meat in the nouse. This servant carries a distaff at her girdle, takes the world easy, and spins. It is really not worth while to waste fuel and work hard. She goes out and buys four sous' worth. of fresh fish, just fried, two sous' worth of Squazetto soup, and two sous' worth of bread, and on this the family get through the day. Still the eight sous must be earned. Earned they are, and that in the most graceful and nonorable manuer, without complaint, without a blush, and by an employment which neither hardens the hands nor corrupts the heart. They are earned by stringing pearls. Yes, all the women in Venice string pearls—the rich to pass the time, the poor to earn their subsistence. Life is easily supported in that city. In Venice you may die of love or hate, but you certainly will not die of hunger."

EATING AND DRINKING.

Venice seems to play the part of the belly among the members of the old Roman apologue. The rich plains of Padua and Vicenza, the rich gardens of the surrounding isles, Friuli, Istria, llyria-countries even as remote as Constantinople-send it their corn, their meat, their fruits, their game, their luxury, and their riches. Dalmatia furnishes wine, which the poorer sort qualify with sea water! Were we not assured of the fact by the testimony of more than one witness we should not credit it.

As in Naples and other southern cities. cook ing and eating are in full operation out of doors. Polenta, meat, and fish smoke, bubble, hiss, and roast in the open air, in the open street. The commonalty patronize to a large extent the soup mentioned above. They consume it on the spot. and cheerfully expend a sou on a bowlful of it. In the shops where it is dispensed they also furnish cooked meat. The wine sellers supply salt mutton, a very popular viand in winter and on holidays. This salted meat, salted wine, and salted fish marvellously conduce to thirsty palates, and morality suffers in consequence. Delicate white cakes formed of the finest flour and nicest butter are supplied to the city in the morning, and must be all consumed before the hour of rest. Like the manna, they will not keep till next morning. If any remain unsold late in the evening, they are distributed gratis to those who, like Chevy Slime, discharge life's duties by waiting round the corner. Rich and poor consume these delicate Bianchetti side of relish.

Another public comestible, the little fried fish already mentioned, must not be forgotten. arm of an undoubted gentleman, purchase four sous' worth of these darling little fishes, smelling of the oil in which they have been fried wrap them in a piece of paper, and go with her cavalier into the next wine shop. Individuals and couples follow their example, and even our fastidious Frenchman tried the experiment, and rather liked it.

The gold chains mentioned above are so delithe cately wrought that they excited the wonder of the that wonderful calculator and machine economist, ad- Charles Babbage. When in Venice he wished ess than a whole chain. Finding out, however, the name of their customer, they put their whole workshops, and would have put their very heads.

The glass manufacture of Venice had once a European and Asiatic reputation. The little island of Murano contained the chief manufactory, and still boasts of the principal one Large mirrors were manufactured there in great quartities in the last century. These were lown, not cast, and it always astonished visitors to see such a mass of the fiery material wielded and blown out by a single pair of lungs at the end of the iron tube. Within the city may be seen, in lesser establishments, rows of men and women sitting before gas jets. plying their little glass tubes, and converting them into beads. some at the same time painting little spots and minute flowers on them. Venetian bells adorn their fair hads with caps of bead work, and beautiful screens mounted in ivory are fashioned of spun glass. The isle of Murano, under the patronage of St. Christopher, possesses, besides its glass manufactory, the final resting place of the Venetians, no interments being allowed within the city.

While on the subject of manufactures, the other products of the indolent city may as well be mentioned. They consist of jewelry, gold and silver stuffs, velvet, silks, fancy soap, earthenware, and wax lights. Printing is exercised on a more extensive scale than in any other city of Italy; but the journeymen, who formerly wore sword on thigh, is now content with a cotton vest and a high cap of blue cloth, provided with leather peak. The secret of producing beautiful filigree work in silver is not lost, and coral. tortoise, and other shells, and mother of pearl. furnish the tasteful craftsmen materials for exhibiting fine taste and exquisite skill.

THE STREETS OF VENICE.
Unless the gentle low-speaking consent to enjoy a festival sitting at their windows and in their balconies, there are serious obstacles in their way. Besides, the canals, which intersect the city in all directions, there is no lack of streets, or cale, as they are called. But such streets! They are four or five feet wide, are nicely flagged, indeed, and provided with a channel to carry away the superfluous water; but fancy a New York dandy conducting a lady in the full panoply invented by the French Empress along one of these cale, and encountered front to front by another gentleman and ladv similarly accoutred.

The shops at each side are not so parrow in many cases as the streets. They are pretty and gay, and are furnished with painted Indian mats. screens, glass beads, models of gondolas, and all those pretty but useless elegances found in the shops of the Palais Royal.

Venice, however, besides its square and Piazetta, and Quay of St. Mark, can boast of one street, the Merceria, which is fully fourteen feet wide-the Broadway of the sea city. It is nicely paved with tiles, and still presents a comparatively animated and pleasant appearance.

For very excellent reasons the Venetians rarely take their comfort or see company on the ground floor, the streets being narrow, or the canal in front. This lower floor is often used as a receptacle for lumber, the family preferring the one above it for the sake of light, or to get at a decent distance from the surface of the water, from which occasionally an offensive smell arises, though not to the extent that strangers apprehend. When the mansion is built round a court there is always a tank in the centre to catch the rain water, and every little square or campa in the city is provided with the "The Venetians entertain in this respect a same convenience. Fresh water, as may be supmore than Spanish pride. They will neither posed, is an article of value in Venice. From e second floors, spoken of above, and where once might be seen hanging rich draperies over the richly-carved stone balconies, and dark-eyed beauties, with arms resting on the rich stuffs and listening to a charming serenade from a gondola, are now frequently found the drying clothes of a working family. The rent of five rooms and a cellar, in a good quarter, is about three dollars of our money per month. A shilling pays the weekly rent of a working family on remote canals. There are a great number of families in poor circcmstances, but apparently, hunger is not a general affliction. There are no beggars, either because the streets are too narrow to afford them comfortable stations, or that watching round the corners for a copper filliped from a gondola across the water, might entail long delays and small profits. An occasinal whimperer is detected in St. Mark's place, but, if the tribe ever flourished, they went out with the bravoes and the thieves. Whether it proceeds from the prevailing honesty of the lower classes, or the wonderful ability of the Austrian police, few residents in these, our days, think it necessary to secure their houses at

THE THEATRES.

Of the eight or nine theatres that once flourshed in Venice, only one or two can be found now open to gratify visitors. Continental theatres being more or less governmental institutions, the native Venetians stay away to indicate to the Emperor that they are not disposed to receive any gratification at his hands. So his Majesty does not think it worth while incurring much expense to amuse his unamusable subjects of Venice; hence the neglect of the drama, and those things connected with it. Venetian audiences were not so very fastidious eighty years ago. An intelligent traveller who visited Venice at that time, entered one of the theatres fully impressed with the worthlessness of what he was about to witness, consisting, as he knew by report, of grimaces, buzzi (by play), and practical jokes. He listened with the utmost gravity while the chief performer, who represented a stutterer, was giving a piece of information to the Harlequin, to which he listened with every mark of eagerness. The unfortunate speaker was striving to acquaint the impatient listener where his mistress was concealed, when he unluckily stumbled on a word of seven syllables, which completely obstructed the progress of the narrative. He attempted it again and again, but always without success. Though there were several other words that would answer just as well, the stutterer would no more adopt another than a saint change his religion. Harlequin presented his friend with a dozen, but he porsisted in his unsuccessful attempts on that which come in his way. At last, making a desperate effort, the cruel word came up with its broad side foremost, and stuck across the nuhappy man's windpipe. He gaped, and panted, and croaked; his face flushed, and his eyes seemed ready to start from his head. Harlequin unbuttoned the statterer's vaistcoat and the neck of his shirt. He fanned his face with his cap, and held a bottle of hartshorn to his nose. At length, fearing his patient would expire before he could give the desired intelligence, in a fit of depair he pitched his head full in the dying man's stomach, and the word bolted out of his mouth to the most distant parts of the house. This was performed in a manner so perfectly drolf, and the expedient came on me so anexpectedly, that my compan-ions and myself burst into an excessive fit of laughter; and we continued in it so long that the attention of the audience being turned from the stage to our box, occasioned a renewal of the mirth all over the play-house.

THE PEOPLE'S NOMINATING COMMITTEE SS BY THE COMMITTEES OF 1863 AND 1864.

conventional labors the appalling news of the assassination of the President of the United States reached us. Our address to you was prepared, but the terrible news of our loss indicated that a special meeting should be held, expressions of our feelings adopted, our address expressions of our feelings adopted, our address changed to suit the occasion, and that our whole work might be rigidly inspected before the names of the new Committee were offered to the public.

In selecting a Committee, we have most thoroughly investigated and tested the loyalty of every nominee; in addition to which we have exacted from each member the following oath:

"I do solemnly swear that I have faithfully supported the Administration since March 4th. supported the Administration since march 4th, 1861, by word, deed and action; and that I have not uttered a word, or harbored a thought which was, or could be, prejudicial to the welfare of the Government of the United States, and that I voted for Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson

We have aimed to select from different classes of citizens those known for their intelligence, worth and general fitness, and who from their antecedents we know have the welfare of the community at heart, who have no personal schemes in view, no friends to favor, no enemies to punish.

Our system of Reform has been so thoroughly established that, strange as it may appear, our example is having a large and beneficial influence upon cities whose years of experience should have entitled them to homage they have failed to earn. We trust the names we now present to the public will meet with their cordial approval, having full faith that, as a Committee, they will nominate none for office but those unquestionably loyal, and who in all respects can claim the admiration and respect of all good and loyal citizens.

The close approach of election day is our only apology for appearing before the public at a time when every heart is full of sorrow, the Nation and City stricken with grief, and when the emblems of mourning, with every word and movement, should be dedicated to an observance of the Nation's calamity.
